Comprehension

It's like wearing white clothing outdoors in a hot climate. The light colour reflects electromagnetic radiation, including light and radiant heat, and keeps the body cool. Wearing a dark suit under a searing midday sun only absorbs more sunlight resulting in the body getting hotter. As Arctic ice for instance, melts and is replaced by darker water, the region's warming is expected to accelerate. It is known as the Albedo effect and now, scientists at the University of Bristol in the UK have come up with a Strategic farming proposal to utilize it by planting varieties of crops that reflect more light back into space in order to reduce global warming.

Their study, published in the journal current biology, shows that by choosing from among existing crop varieties their best estimate for how much solar reflectivity might be increased leads them to predict that summer-time temperatures could be reduced by more than one degree celsius throughout much of central North America and mid-latitude Eurasia. This would be welcome relief for regions which are forecast to suffer dangerous heat waves in the coming century at very little cost.
