Would anyone imagine that a prematurely born, polio-affected scarlet fever victim could win three Golds in running in the Olympics and be called the fastest woman on earth? Well, Wilma did it. Yes, Wilma Glodean Rudolph, born into a middle-class black family in the U.S.A., rose from her physical disability to Olympic glory. Needing braces even to walk till she was nine, by the age of twelve, Wilma challenged even boys in running. With her steely determination, the support of her devoted family and the guidance of her coach, Edward Stanley Temple, she grew to be the first American woman to win three Golds in the Olympics. She achieved that record at the Summer Olympics 1960, in Rome, Italy. She instantly became an international celebrity. She was inducted into the United States Olympic Hall of Fame in 1983. She established the Wilma Rudolph Foundation to train athletes. Her autobiography, Wilma, was published in the year 1977. Leaving an excellent legacy behind, she died on 12 November 1994.

Adolescence is a time of life when a person's self esteem is known to fluctuate significantly. It is estimated that up to a half of all adolescents will struggle with low self esteem .There are some common indicators that suggest a teenager may have issues with self esteem.

One of the most observable signs of low self esteem is when a teenager walks everywhere with his head pointed downwards and his chin stuck to the top of his chest. Teens with low self esteem often feel like they want to hide and get through public situations unnoticed. Teens who feel that they are not worth much may find it very hard to make eye contact with others when communicating. They avoid making a connection because they assume others have the same negative view of them as they do. Then again, the language teens use will often convey what it is they believe. Phrases like “I am useless”, “I always get it wrong,” are examples of someone expressing negative beliefs about who she is.

Teenagers who feel bad about themselves will often seek to be negative about others. This is usually a defence mechanism. Often teens will be most critical of others who exhibit similar qualities that they don’t like about themselves. Feelings of worthlessness can also manifest in a genuine fear of physical contact from others. When teens feel they are not valuable or worthwhile they can crave attention.

Feelings of inadequacy in teens may also be manifested as excessive bragging about themselves, their achievements, or appearance. They may speak too loudly and be aggressive in their tone. They may also avoid social situations. Teens who have few friends or weak bonds with peers commonly have low self esteem.
